

The Pluto Observer

Watchdog to the Solar System

3rd Anniversary Edition

September 2008

We're Three Years Old This Month!

This month, The Pluto Observer celebrates its 3rd Anniversary and, as we enter into our fourth year of bringing you unconventional Solar System news and commentary, we have once again changed our look. Our header is in two new fonts and the newsletter's main body has changed fonts once again.

That is simply our prerogative as an underground newsletter with virtually no editorial restraints placed upon us by Earthling publishers. But we've also changed our font because our star investigative reporter, Jonco Bugos, informed us that Comic Sans MS may look all right on your computer screen but it prints out just a little too bold and dark. So, by switching to a lighter font, we're helping our readers to save ink or toner when they print a hard copy.

Jonco made a conciliatory suggestion that the Observer might return to the old Times New Roman font, which looked and printed quite well, even though we Plutonians are superstitious about going backward in time for any reason. But we switched back to Times New Roman, just for you.

Who would have thought that the simple and often outrageous newsletter that Jonco started for us in September 2005 would still be going strong three years later?

So, join Jonco Bugos and us as we wish The Pluto Observer a "Happy 3rd Anniversary!"

The doomsday prophecy circulating around the solar system about Planet X (also called Nibiru) may generate high ratings for blogs and Internet videos on Earth but, out here at the edge of the solar system, we just prefer to watch and wait and simply take our chances with being popular in the meantime.

3rd Anniversary Backhand-of-the-Month Award

Now that the Democratic National Convention is over in the United States and Republican John McCain has selected a woman running mate to be his Vice President, if elected, we at The Pluto Observer would like to bestow the BOTM Award for September 2008 (and for our Third Anniversary) to both The Democratic National Committee and the Republican National Committee for not doing what you should have done when it was the best time to do it and for doing what you did when you shouldn't have. And that is grooming and supporting a female Presidential Candidate when it's way past time to do so. "Monkey see and monkey do" is apparently the motto of the 2008 Presidential Election Campaign and each political party has outdone the other this year with flying red and blue colors.

Plutonian Tip-of-the-Day:

"When you mix American politics with any kind of religion you always get red and blue".

Plutonian Tip-of-the-Hat

As we've said before, we Plutonians rarely doff our hats or our space helmets to anyone and very rarely to anyone from planet Earth. However, we would be remiss if we did not take this 3rd Anniversary opportunity to offer a big Tip-of-the-Hat to U.S. Senator Hillary Clinton for making the best political speech of the entire 2008 Presidential Election Campaign.

Her intelligent and no-nonsense delivery of issues and ideas as Headline Speaker at the Democratic National Convention really needed to be heard and heeded by her fellow countrymen (the Observer is not a politically-correct publication). They certainly captured the hearts and minds of all Plutonians. Too bad her own fellow Americans and Democratic Party leaders failed to see that she is still the best candidate for President of the United States.
